Bass Jackson and Kate have given us a beautiful book full of thoughtful tips for making our cats' lives happier, and our homes happier for them. There's a "system" -- based on cat behavior in general, and specific likes and dislikes of individual cats; for example, some cats like to climb (build shelves up high) and some cats like to be down low (place cocoons on the floor). It includes clear illustrations of traffic flow to avoid conflict among cats, and plenty of inspirational photos. The book includes lots of DIY tips which are pretty detailed, although in some cases not quite detailed enough. All in all a big step forward for cats, whose needs have been rather neglected compared to our canine friends. BUT . . . there's a glaring omission -- where are the cat litter boxes? If the idea is to make the home a haven for indoor cats, so they're not exposed to the dangers of the outdoors, then necessarily there must be cat boxes, and there's nary a mention. Jackson highlights the "catification" he did in his former tiny apartment with 3 cats, but if he follows his stated recommendation of 1 box per cat plus 1 -- it's left me wondering, does he really have 4 litter boxes in that 500 sf space? Where? What about the people with 11 cats that have built elaborate climbing shelves all over the house -- do they have wall to wall litter boxes in a spare bedroom or what? We need creative solutions for this part too, please. 4 of 4 people found the following review helpful. If you have an indoor cat, but you want your home decorated for you, read CATIFICATION By Beth If you have an indoor cat(s), you probably realize how important it is that she have places indoors where she can climb and scratch and that otherwise make up for what she's missing outdoors. But we want our homes to be decorated for us, not our cats, right? With CATIFICATION you can, as its subtitle says, design a happy and stylish home for your cat and you. But be sure to begin by reading Part 1 in order to first understand what catification is. You'll learn how important this is to your cat as well as to you. Then you'll probably see your home differently. I do. Now I look at everything in my rooms in relation to possible catification: "cat superhighways," "dead ends," scratching posts that double as climbing ramps and stairs, "cat bridges," and "kitty TV." And I can't wait until this spring, when the snow is gone and the weather is warm, so my husband and I can build a "catio." If only CATIFICATION was around when my cat was alive! With every page, I couldn't help but think about how it would apply to her. But I'm going to get another cat now, and this time I'll do it right. 13 of 14 people found the following review helpful. 'Cattery' at it's best! By TLR First I want to say, that in my opinion, Jackson Galaxy is the end all when it comes to 'Cattery'! This book has so many good ideas for the skilled home builder and the not-so-skilled, like myself, along with small to hefty budgets. Happy cats are busy cats and this will show you how. Many believe if you give a cat food, water and a litter box they are so independent that's all you need, so wrong. Having cats all my life, there is no doubt indoor cats need stimulation and now a days ALL cats should be indoor. It's a good read with a lot of useful information. And if you like Jackson Galaxy, pick up Cat Daddy, his first book. It may give you insights into cats you did not have before!

The cats, not the people, are his No. 1 priority." The New York Times About the Author Jackson Galaxy is a cat behaviorist and the host of Animal Planets hit show My Cat from Hell. great time to be the cat guy. When I started out my life working with animals, around 1993, it was at a shelter in Boulder, Colorado. Within weeks of realizing that the cats had something they wanted to tell me, the other staff members seemed to smell a cat person in their presence. They immediately christened me Catboy, and put me on the job of decoding everything about cats for everybody. Good thing I was up for the challenge. Back then, the sense of cats being other from humans was clearly prevalent. I mean, if shelter workers were scratching their heads about cat behavior, imagine what the rest of the world was thinking (or not). As a matter of fact, as my knowledge base grew and I refined my techniques, I branched out to other shelters to find the same desperately inquisitive population. You will never find a more compassionate lot than those who dedicate their lives to caring for homeless animals. That said, we were in dire straits. We were labeling as unadoptable cats who were acting out from a place that not enough people understood. In the reality of that time, unadoptable meant euthanized. If that didn't give Catboy a sense of urgency, nothing would. As I left the shelter to pursue private practice, I was constantly up against a seemingly unsolvable puzzle: guardians cared enough to hire me instead of getting rid of the cat, and that was fantastic; at the same time, however, the suggestion that problems could be remedied by adding more litter boxes, toys, and trees (and, of course, not hiding them in the basement) was a distinctly unwelcome one. We wanted the problem gone, but the solution was aesthetically painful to most. Almost all of the guardians I came in contact with were panicked that if I had my way, I would turn their home into the crazy cat lady house. Of course, that sense of aesthetic panic on the part of my clients panicked me. It wasn't just a matter of not wanting a litter box in the living room; it symbolized a lack of true empathy toward, and an investment in, love for cats. We could easily bear the notion of spreading dog blankets, toys, dishes, beds and stinky rawhides around our house. We wouldn't ask to hide our dogs' existence any more than we would try to hide our children. In the meantime, cats, and the smallest perceptible evidence that they actually lived in our homes, rode squarely in the back of the domestic bus. In the ensuing twenty years, I've been privileged to witness the cat renaissance; those that were considered otherworldly, aloof, more furniture than family are enjoying a surge in popularity like no other time in their domesticated history. We hungrily devour cat memes, watch cat videos by the tens of millions (even creating celebrities out of those video cats) and, thankfully for those of us in the rescue community, adopt them in record numbers. The animal that for tens of thousands of years enjoyed a great reputation as a working animal controlling rodents on farms, for instance, has become a bona fide companion. A truly amazing bonus to being seen as a companion is that under the surface we are asking not only what we can do for cats to make their lives better, but we are acknowledging what they do for us. Cats are now seen by millions as supportive family members, bearers of unconditional love. We better understand that cats don't show love and devotion like dogs do, and so we invest in the time needed to learn a new language. You may think of Catfication as a design book; it is so much more than that. In the same way that our refusal to add litter boxes symbolized cat shame, what you will see in this book symbolizes cat love. It doesn't illustrate what lengths those crazy cat people will go to, but rather the maturation of us as humans. At the very core of my belief system is the knowledge that a meaningful relationship with the animal world completes us as humans. The concept of dominion, of a natural order of things that has us dominating cats with an iron fist and without regard to their physical, emotional, and spiritual needs, is simply an old way of thinking. I jokingly say that successfully living with cats relies on your ability to compromise. Learning the language of cats, and changing up our environment to accommodate them, to me, is a symbol of our evolution, as it demonstrates our willingness, on a deep level, to compromise for the sake of an animal's happiness. And where does that leave us? In a pretty good place. I hope you believe that what you hold in your hands is something far beyond a design book. It's a celebration. A home that proudly advertises that you care about your own comfort as well as that of your animal companions is beautiful to some, but for shelter workers, rescuers, foster parents, and others, it's a moment to shed a tear of gratitude. Cats have cleared a significant hurdle in their timeline. And make no mistake, that timeline has been a rough one. Does Catfication mean that we're on our way to becoming like the ancient Egyptians, deifying and burying cats alongside our human family members? Maybe not. Elevating cats, however, means we care not only about the ones in our homes, but all of them. We are beginning to care not just on the lunatic fringe but across the human spectrum about whether they live or die. And that means more will live. Soon, millions fewer every year will die. And that makes it a good time to be the Catboy. A friendly greeter at the front door. A fuzzy bed warmer on a cold night. A purring companion curled up on your lap. Living with cats gives us a certain pleasure no other animal companion can provide. Cats are elegant, intelligent, loving creatures that have entered our homes and our hearts. In return for what they give us, we, as responsible cat guardians, must provide them with the things they need to live in a happy, healthy, safe, and stimulating environment. Keeping cats indoors is the best way to ensure they live long, healthy lives. Yes, cats have natural instincts, such as climbing and hunting, which can be fulfilled when they go outside, but the dangers far outweigh the benefits. Outdoor cats face threats from cars, poisons, being trapped or locked in places they shouldn't be, fights with other outdoor animals, and further unthinkable outcomes. We're here to tell you that you can (and should) keep your beloved feline family members safely indoors, and that you can easily give them all the things they need to thrive. That is what Catfication is all about. The Catfication process starts by understanding how your cat sees the world. Consider yourself the designer and your cat, your client. It's your responsibility to understand your client's needs and preferences. We introduce you to the concept of cat mojo in this book, giving you all the tools you need so you can think (and more important, feel) like your feline. In Part 1, we first show you how cats in general are hardwired to see their environment. Then we help you discover your own cats specific preferences. Armed with this new information, you will be inspired to enhance your cats environment to accommodate his or her likes and dislikes, encourage positive behaviors, and discourage negative ones. Part 2 offers a full range of project ideas and inspiration for creating a well-designed and cat-friendly home that provides your cat with the stimulation he or she needs in a way that makes you happy, too. Please dont think you have to cover everything in your house with beige carpet to Catify! That is definitely not the case. You can live with a cat and still have a home you are proud to show off. Catification comes in every style; it just takes a little inspiration and creativity. Catification doesnt have to be a huge undertaking. It can be as simple as rearranging some furniture. We show you a variety of projects, including many that are easy and inexpensive. We hope you will find something to inspire you at the level where you are comfortable whatever your skill or budget. Why Catify? Catification has immediate and obvious benefits for both you and your cat. Many behavior problems can be reduced or even eliminated with the introduction of certain environmental enhancements. Catification is essential, whether you have one cat or several, but in a multi-cat household, it is especially critical. Its the only way to keep the peace among multiple cats living in the same home. Environmental enhancements give everyone the space they need to coexist and live peacefully, even in a very small living space. Catified homes can reduce stress levels for all occupants human, feline, canine, etc. Lowering stress can reduce health problems and even increase life expectancy, for everybody. Ultimately, if your cat is happier, you will be happier, too, and the bond between you will deepen. It is our hope that the information and ideas in this book will inspire more people to bring cat companions into their homes and their lives. We are facing an enormous pet overpopulation problem in the United States, and cats more frequently suffer the consequences than any other animal. We feel Catification is one of the key factors in changing this trend. If cat guardians can understand how their cats see the world and make the necessary changes to accommodate those preferences, more cats will stay in happy forever homes, and fewer will be sent to shelters or, worse, outside to fend for themselves. Opening your heart and your home to a cat companion (or two!) is one of the most rewarding things you can do. Lets Catify!

Jackson and Kate Cats are hardwired to see the world a certain way. If you take the time to understand your cats perspective, it will be much easier to Catify your home. Of course, every cat is different, and we get to that in an upcoming chapter, but first, lets put on our cat glasses and take a look at how and why cats see their environment the way they do.

Who Is the Raw Cat? If you strip away all the trappings of the modern domestic housecat the fancy beds, the cushy lifestyle, the food on demand whats left is the Raw Cat, essentially a wild animal who is a dedicated, carnivorous hunter, and an animal positioned firmly in the middle of the food chain; in other words, every one of his or her senses is honed as both predator and prey. The Raw Cat always has one eye open whether hunting, securing resources, defending his or her territory, or even sleeping and eliminating. Its all done with the sharpened senses of kill or be killed. Watch your cat come to life as he spots a moth on the ceiling or a bird outside the window thats the Raw Cat engaging prey. Observe your cats eyes, ears, and musculature as she sees another cat enter the room thats the Raw Cat preparing and executing a friend-or-foe kind of threat assessment of her territory. These are the behaviors responsible for the successful propagation of the species for tens of thousands of years. As you learn more about the Raw Cat and how domestic cats are hard-wired, start observing your cat and ask yourself the following questions: How does my cat tap into his or her inner Raw Cat?
